

ExecutivePerils

Nobody connected to a network is EVER 100% secure from HACKERS. They can destroy data, release information to competitors or make the computer system unusable.

 A consultant hired by a large computer corporation was convicted of three counts of computer crimes. The consultant was hired as a computer system administrator and subsequently installed software to crack passwords of computer users and installed an unauthorized program to transfer files.

 A shipbuilding company's former employee was arrested in conjunction with unauthorized access to the firm's computer system. The ex-employee had gained unauthorized access to the firm's computer database putting up to 750,000 commercially sensitive documents at risk

 A computer intruder has written a program that has entered dozens of computers and networks automatically stealing electronic documents containing user passwords and deleting files to conceal itself

 A fortune 100 company's entire database was encrypted by a disgruntled employee. The ransom note read in effect: "Try to crack the code or pay me $1,000,000 and I will give you the password." The company paid the $1,000,000

There has never been a specific product to cover organizations, other than banks, for financial losses sustained as the result of employee or intentional hacking.

Until now.....

- Losses caused by fraudulent and malicious acts committed by either employees or third parties against the insured's computer systems, electronic computer programs, electronic data & media and computer virus attacks which hinder or can even close down the operations of the insured.
- Extortion when someone threatens to introduce a computer virus into the computer system or threatens to divulge information held on computer systems.
- Business interruption and extra expense as a result of computer virus or malicious destruction of the data inside the computer system.

ExecutivePerils is an independent wholesaler.

Our success is solely dependent on servicing
YOU – the independent agent and Broker