- Racial Discrimination: An international oil conglomerate was alleged to have denied promotions and raises to over one thousand past and present African-Americans employees. The company agreed to settle after the release of transcripts of secretly taped conversations that appeared to show Caucasian executives belittling African-American employees. The company also allegedly destroyed documents being sought by the claimants in the litigation.

- Civil Rights (Race and Gender Discrimination): An executive recruiter claimed that a foreign automobile manufacturer told him not to send resumes of African American and female candidates because the managers of the firm allegedly did not want them. The jury found against the manufacture and then doubled the penalty pursuant the state's Unruh Civil Rights Act.

- Disability Discrimination: A 47-year-old female flight service manager employee was wrongfully terminated after working for an airline for 26 years. - Reverse Race Discrimination: Eight Caucasian police officers suffered emotional distress when they were removed from a promotional list after a lawsuit was filed by a minority police officer. The suit alleged there was an insufficient number of minority officers receiving promotions. Claimants had passed sergeant's exam and were on waiting list. The police officers discarded the tests, however, and a new test was given. Claimants contend that police officers' actions constituted reverse discrimination and that they deserved promotions based on the results of the first test.
